Facebook faces its first legal test in Europe A European Union court is expected to rule on Thursday whether Facebook broke EU data-protection laws by tracking users even if they had unfriended them. The case, which has shadowed Facebook since it was brought in 2012, is the first in which EU data protection regulators, the European data protection supervisor and 20,000 people have sought damages from the social-network giant. Lawyers for the complainants accuse Facebook of using large numbers of automated scripts to trawl through users' email accounts and try to draw conclusions from their interactions on the network. Facebook denies being responsible for this. Alma van der Bolt, a lawyer who represents one of the complainants, said she was hopeful that the judge would consider that "the users had, in fact, unfriended him." The case involves people in the Netherlands, Belgium and Sweden who claim that Facebook scraped personal data from them without their consent and then used it to generate profiles that were more targeted towards their political and religious leanings. Facebook and some other social networks provide software that can be used to automatically track people's activities on them. They can track whether a person likes a page on Facebook, or has shared a particular news story. The problem, according to people who helped devise EU data protection law, is that people think they can control who can see their interactions on a social network. So "do not like" or "unfriend" are triggers that cause the software to stop tracking. But social networks can work out what has been posted to users' timelines, and also infer that other users "like" or "read" the material. "Automated systems can systematically extract profiles from data collected from users' activities on the social network," a judge in the European court of justice concluded in the case in June last year. He said Facebook had broken EU data protection law, and ordered it to amend its systems. Facebook, which is based in California, was not part of that decision. The company has previously said that it did not have all the required data about
