According to documents provided by the trade group, about 19,000 individuals have signed up to join its database in Canada since it was launched last March. The group's members span 13 provinces and territories but none currently grow on a commercial scale. The file sharing database is a prototype, and the pot producers' actual cultivation operations will remain in the black market unless Canada passes laws to legalize marijuana, said spokesperson Todd Abrams. The database was created by Denver-based PharmaCann, which has served as the official U.S. regulator for U.S.-based marijuana production companies since 2006. This week, the Canadian Press reported that the organization is being investigated by Canadian authorities for marketing the database. "It's absolutely news to us," Abrams told CBC News. "The only marketing we've done in Canada is what the federal government has allowed us to do with no objection and no issue by Health Canada or any other level of government." PharmaCann claims the database is a public service, allowing access to Canadians who are growing their own pot, as well as "a variety of industry stakeholders" such as dispensary operators, cultivation companies and seed banks. "It's a labour of love," Abrams said. Pot users have access to an online resource for finding high-quality seeds as well as legal growing advice. "If we can provide more resources to grow quality marijuana, it's a benefit for a lot of people," he said. "If you have a patient who is growing his own medicine and he can't access information, this helps in that regard
