A comparison of MRI and PET in the diagnosis of pediatric brain tumors. Both MRI and FDG-PET, in addition to other imaging modalities, have important applications in the diagnosis of pediatric brain tumors. PET provides additional anatomic detail due to the relatively high sensitivity to metastatic brain disease, while MRI, while anatomically limited, can provide important pathologic information by identifying mass effects and leptomeningeal involvement. FDG-PET cannot be used in infants and younger children because of the safety concerns posed by the administration of radioactive compounds in this age group. On the other hand, the use of MRI without gadolinium requires an intravenous injection of a contrast medium that would not be part of the routine protocol. For these reasons, MRI is routinely used for the diagnosis of pediatric brain tumors. This article will briefly review each of these modalities and make recommendations regarding their strengths and limitations for the diagnosis of pediatric brain tumors.Prevalence and Predictors of HIV Acquisition in Men Whose Partners Are HIV-Infected. Prevention strategies should be evaluated in the context of the potential reduction in sexual behavior that may be associated with HIV diagnosis of the primary partner. We further compared the prevalence of nonacute HIV infection in men whose partners are HIV-infected and men whose partners are uninfected. Among men whose partners were HIV-infected, higher partner HIV serostatus was associated with lower reported condom use (tendency of P =.054), higher numbers of sexual partners in the last 6 months (P =.009), and higher daily condom use (P
