FORTUNE — With the US economy slowing, home sales have been struggling — but then again, it's been hard to find a list of “hot” or “healthy” markets. Yet in the last six months, at least two dozen states have posted double-digit annual declines in the number of homes sold. If this performance continues, will there come a time when the market is so underperforming that prices won't rise? “I think the answer is yes,” says US economist Nela Richardson of the University of California San Diego. “Unless something dramatically changes in the real estate market, we're going to see the same type of situation that we saw after the Great Recession — where we're going to see price declines.” Home prices have been sinking for almost two years now. Since the end of the housing bubble in late 2006, home sales have declined in 38 states across the country. Prices have dropped precipitously in many cities. As if to make up for this, buyers are increasingly cutting deals that also cut into the price of the house. “If you were a newbie buyer back in 2008, 2007, 2006 — you didn't know what you were getting into,” says Sean McAlinden, chief economist for the housing-market research firm realtor.com.
